Peace processes are mostly very fragile. This engagingly written book takes a bold new approach to the topic by beginning from the premise that sociology can identify those factors that help to stabilize them.

The book draws a distinction between the political and social dimensions of peace processes, arguing that each is dependent on the other. Consideration of the social peace process, neglected in conventional treatments of the subject, is made central to this volume. While complementing current approaches that emphasize institutional reform in politics, law and economics, it pays due attention to sociological factors such as gender, civil society, religion, the deconstruction of violent masculinities, restorative justice, emotions, hope, forgiveness, truth recovery, social memory and public victimhood. These important themes are fully illustrated with examples and in-depth case studies from across the globe.

The book locates itself within the growing debate about the positive impact of global civil society on peace and identifies the new forms of peace work engendered by globalization. It will be essential reading for students and scholars of peace studies in politics, international relations and sociology departments.
ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Professor of Sociology at University of Aberdeen

FEATURES

• Takes a bold new approach to the study of peace processes by focusing on what sociology has to offer the discipline

• Takes a unique perspective by giving due weight to the social dimensions of peacebuilding, as opposed to the traditional focus on political dimensions

• Considers the role of issues such as gender, civil society, religion, emotions, social memory and public victimhood

• Fully illustrated with examples and in-depth case studies from across the globe

To purchase this product, please visit https://www.wiley.com/en-us/9780745647760